The UK government has said it will introduce carbon tax by 2018 in a bid to meet its legally-binding commitment to cut emissions by 80% on 1990 levels by 2050. The move will be timed to coincide with the next G8 summit to be held in the UK. Environment Secretary Liz Truss said the tax was the "most cost-effective way to reduce emissions". But she added that it would only apply to the "top third of the economy" and that energy intensive industries would still be exempt. The announcement came as ministers published more detailed proposals for policies they hope will help the country meet its climate change targets. Transport emissions would be phased out by 2040 while energy efficiency targets will be introduced for the electricity sector in the same period. Industries such as the steel and cement industries will still be exempt from the new tax, although electricity producers will have to meet their own carbon reduction targets. Ms Truss said that the carbon price rise would be "phased in" over four years to allow businesses time to plan ahead. Analysis: John Moylan, BBC environment analyst In principle the UK government has put a price on carbon. In practice, that makes sense. A tax, after all, is just a method of putting an economic price on something. And the tax you put on one of the world's biggest carbon polluters, America, goes a long way to changing the US economy. But this won't be a simple carbon tax. Instead, the UK government wants to introduce a series of "cap and trade" schemes to push down emissions. It's complicated, but these don't have to be put in place right away and could even be phased in over time. In many ways this is the most important detail - what exactly does the UK government want the price to be? The announcement did not mean that there would be a global price on carbon, only that the UK would use cap and trade to set its own level for emissions. A change in the way the UK tries to reduce emissions is likely to be welcomed by countries such as China who have been urging the UK to use an economic price on carbon.
